

The Joke About Housing (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from The Joke About Housing
In the summer of 1917, when the housing problem had attained nation-wide prominence in the United States, and when rumblings of the oncoming disaster, in the shape of an acute shortage of houses in the United States, were plainly audible, The Journal of the American Institute of Architects and the Ladies Home Journal joined in holding a competition for The Best Solution of the Housing Problem. The terms of the competition were unique and provided for the submission of two written theses, one upon the social purpose which any solution should seek to accomplish, and the other upon the economic method by which such a solution could be accomplished. In addition to these requirements there was a third, which embraced a simple drawing of the physical plan that should illustrate the application of the principles set forth in the two theses.
